BY MURRAT. The wall of autumn's surly blast, In accents drear and chill Was heard; and falling thick and fast, Accursed by na ura's will,
Came faded leaves, and onward moved,
Fit emblems of our hopes; we loved,
Loved wildly, madly still,

Though sorrow spoke from each low tone. That mingled with the wind's sad moan. We stood again where oft before Our happlest hours were spent; But not nappy as in days of yore, For changed was our intent. The gentle smiles and words of cheer Were seen nor heard no more; a tear That spoke of ties now rent,

Came, as the spirit's struggling spell Told that we had loved, a as! too well. I spoke! my soul was full o' pride; it scorned an humble part! Its trembling fears were cast aside-Were banished from my heart. Upon my wrong I steadied up my soul-Those eyes could now no more control My words ;they made you start

And pale, as if a poisen'd dart

Had drank the life-blood of your heart, You kissed me then, (Oh, bland deceit !) As near you trembling trod. Oh, fool! Hoved you, lovely cheat, Better than Fame or God! But oh, too late the wily snare, The bumbled look, the altered air, The low bewitching nod! I know thy truth, I know thy heart;

They taught me this-'twas meet we part.
